THROUGH THE EYES OF AN IMMIGRANT

Tajana Truthseeker

I was 10 years old when we landed in Canada with the promise of a new home and a new life. My family and I had just spent 5 years in a refugee camp in Switzerland evading a war in Bosnia, with a constant feeling of uncertainty about when we would be sent back and hoping the war would end, if that day ever came. But all those fears slowly withered away when Canada accepted our application and we were offered a chance at a new beginning. Our new home and promised land. My parents and I integrated well into our new way of life and Canada became our home. As I grew older, I identified as a Canadian first and foremost, being Canadian made me proud. After all, on the world stage, Canada represented a country where immigrants and Canadians shared values of equal understanding and lived in peace even with their differences. A country that presented opportunities as far as the stars if you were willing to work hard to get there. As with any country, of course, issues existed, but Canada was working towards being the friendliest place on Earth. I embodied the true spirit of what it meant to be Canadian regardless of political views and religious differences. I wore a Canada flag proudly across my travels and was truly happy that this country accepted us in a time of need. As I grew older and started to understand what politics and propaganda could do to a country, I began to question how a country like Yugoslavia could fall apart and how people who once were lifelong friends could turn on each other. That is when I started to research history and human psychology to understand how a nation could let things get to the point of killing one another. I didn't fully understand this until 2020.

Even when the lockdowns of 2020 came, I had faith in my fellow Canadians that they would act in the same understanding and friendly manner while the situation of pandemic unfolded because, after all, this was Canada, the friendliest place on Earth, where people were mild-tempered, would act morally and logically under such unprecedented times. That was until 2021 when the vaccine push came into play. I started to watch the same tactics that were used to create a war in Yugoslavia take place in Canada. People who were once compassionate when I came here as an immigrant were now yelling at me to go back to the country I came from for refusing medical treatment. People were telling me that I was not a true Canadian and I was endangering the lives of those around me. A country I once loved, just turned into my worst nightmare and felt like an open-air prison. All the feelings I carried in that refugee camp came flooding back with vengeance. As I watched the Prime Minister of this great nation call me a racist, anti-science and uneducated. A PM who touted himself and his party as all-inclusive representing Canadian values, was at the helm of leading a group of the hateful fear-mongering mob to exile me from society at all costs. The dangers of his divisive and hateful words were suddenly sponged up by millions of Canadians who turned that hate towards those who chose not to get vaccinated.

Even though I was educated at a Canadian University graduating with a Bachelor of Science in Molecular Biology and Biochemistry the leader of this country was labeling me an uneducated anti-science quack. The racism and hate induced by the people following Trudeau's message stirred every PTSD symptom I had from the war and the refugee camp.

I felt like I had lived a 25-year lie, being a citizen who never committed a crime, paid my taxes, followed the customs and laws of Canada to be kicked lower than I have ever felt. As much as I was voicing my opinion online, I was having second thoughts about participating in being a Canadian after the pandemic. I had gotten my Bosnian and Serbian passports ready for my husband and myself and I was ready to sell it all and go back to where I was born. Upon the request of the many tolerant and loving liberals who had suggested I do so during the pandemic. Canada felt like a danger to anyone who did not fall in line. That was until the trucker protest. Just as I was losing hope in Canada and humanity as a whole, the truckers of Canada sparked a worldwide movement that showed us the power of unity and love. For the first time in 3 years, I didn't feel alone. The truckers made me realize there was hope and so many of us who did not fall for the garbage spewed by the government and media. The protest is what sparked my will to fight for what was right. I may not have been able to fight for my birth country at the time of war, but as an adult now I could stand up for the millions of Canadians who felt as hopeless and lost as I was. The unity that happened in Ottawa was the Canada I knew and loved. From immigrants to Canadians sharing in laughter, food and dancing. Seeing people open their homes and cooking for those less fortunate was truly heartwarming. Seeing people work together to avoid police blockades on fuel and bringing food to the truckers, made me realize just how amazing this country truly was and still is. Not only was this movement felt across Canada, but it sparked a freedom movement across the world, and I can say I'm proud of the Canadians who stood up for what is right. Not all hope was lost and the Canada I grew up loving still existed in this blanketed dark time. Even with Trudeau's push to segregate us, the light still fluttered, and I wanted to play my part in igniting it to shine onto the darkness that fell on this once great nation.

Those of us who migrated to Canada, did so for a better life, evading war, communism or human rights violations being enacted on us from our home countries. We have experienced the slow progression towards tyranny and how in a flash one can lose one's rights if they are not paying attention to the political climate around them. What I witnessed from Trudeau and his loyal followers was to the letter what I had seen in my home country before the war broke out and what history books warned us about. What made it worse was that so many Canadians whom I considered my neighbors and friends would blindly follow a true racist, anti-science hypocrite like Trudeau and the media spewing his misguided rules. The disappointment still lingers as I see so many fellow Canadians fall for propaganda and in the name of virtue signaling, commit crimes against humanity onto their fellow citizens with threats of COVID camps and a complete exile from society for a simple medical choice. I am hoping that citizens of Earth not just Canada finally learn that the lesson to take from this and the many lessons we should have learned from the past, segregation under any circumstance is the wrong choice.

HER BODY, NOT HER CHOICE

Her Name Is Susan

At the height of the pandemic with restrictions in place and the roll out of the vaccine we saw an incredible push by our government to use any means necessary to pressure Canadians into injecting the new drug regardless of personal concerns, experiences or desires. Canadians who did not comply with the vaccine mandates were discarded by their places of employment, shunned by family and friends and told by the government they were a danger to society. Even the Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau referred to the unvaccinated as science deniers that were both misogynist and racist, stoking more division and hate amongst the Canadian population. From a government that spouts bodily autonomy and “my body my choice” the effects of the violent push to destroy peoples lives if they didn’t comply was on full display. For one woman, Susan, a member of the RCMP, this was one choice she was not willing to hand over to the government.

Pre pandemic, Susan was a single mother and an accomplished, award winning member of the RCMP. She was celebrated by her colleagues and superiors, well respected and loved. When the pandemic hit she was forced to work from home but still genuinely loved her job. As the vaccines were rolled out, she started to feel uneasy, she knew there was something not sitting right with how strongly the government was pushing these injections. She saw people around her lining up to get their shots, watched as her children made the same decision and her fear for their safety grew. Susan was seeing the reports of menstrual cycle issues and other serious side effects and knew it was not something she would be taking part in. Then came the push from the RCMP.

With daily emails coming into the division with threats of a loss of income if demands for vaccination were not met Susan was dealing with something far deeper and far more damaging.

As a victim of childhood sexual abuse and later a victim of sexual assault as an adult, the thought of being forced into submission for something she did not want was troubling. The loss of control, the feelings of helplessness, the nightmares, all resurfaced and she was once again, a small child, without the ability to be heard. Voiceless, cornered, and isolated. Susan described feeling more supported by people in online communities than the people in her life. She found herself depressed, potentially losing her home, and without the help she needed to deal with the traumas the mandates had brought to the surface. She wasn’t going to let this destroy her however. She picked herself up, found an employer that would not discriminate and kept moving.

Susan was eventually ordered back to work at the RCMP and while she was excited to be doing what she loved again, she felt as though when she walked the halls, she was walking the halls of her abuser, the perpetrator that took her dignity, her voice and held her future hostage. She is still healing from the last few years, still working to build herself back up and find ways to handle the psychological injury this has caused. Susan wants people to understand, there is hope moving forward, we can recover as a society, but we need to also understand the effects this type of government overreach can have on individuals. Personal choice, power over ones body, these are sacred and they must never be at risk again.

If you or someone you know has been a victim of sexual abuse please contact the Canadian Resource Center for Victims of Crime at the information below.

IF IT COULD SAVE ONE LIFE

The Garnet Harper Story

Father of 5, Husband, Son, Brother, Friend, Garnet Harper was a voice for the suffering throughout the pandemic. His voice will be remembered as one that stood for what's right, that stood for human rights and bodily autonomy, a voice for those feeling hopeless and isolated during covid lockdowns. You will be hard pressed to find anyone that will not speak with adoration and love for Garnet, but health care policies, discrimination, and divisive words from our government, the very thing Garnet spoke against, were finally what silenced his voice in a death that should never have occurred.

In February 2022, Garnet was diagnosed with high blood pressure and put on double dose of a medication that caused damage to his kidneys which then turned into kidney failure. An otherwise healthy 35 year old man, he was a perfect candidate for a transplant, until he was asked about his vaccine status. Because Garnet was not vaccinated he was refused a referral to the transplant center and this began the long fight to overcome the politicization of the health care system and save Garnet's life.

When Garnet finally had no other choice but to start dialysis, the obstacles and mistreatment didn't stop. Given a mask exemption from his doctor, he was sent to the operating room to install his access line. The surgeon however that was meant to perform the installation refused to do so if Garnet did not wear a mask, ignoring his medical exemption. The hospital sent Garnet away, telling him they will call him when they have a surgeon that will agree to his medical care without forced masking. Megan, Garnet's wife would not accept this and immediately checked him into emergency finding a doctor who agreed, ignored the surgeons complaint and sent Garnet back upstairs making sure he was given the care he needed.

Inspite of all of this Garnet's spirit never failed, through contracting a staph infection, fluid on his lungs, endocarditis and having to learn to walk again, he would not give up.

Garnet's love for his family and faith that the world could be a better place kept him moving he was hopeful he would make a full recovery and finally be given the transplant he needed. He was receiving dialysis three times a week and had become a perfect candidate for at home dialysis, being called a miracle by his medical team.

On May 22, Garnet suffered a hemorrhagic stroke, a complication of dialysis, and passed away in hospital surrounded by family. A strong, young father, otherwise healthy, with an incredible life ahead of him, denied life saving measures for refusing an experimental injection, had been shamelessly taken from his family. During the last moments Megan had with her husband, after fighting with the medical system to provide him the kidney he needed, the hospital asked Megan if they could harvest Garnet's organs. The lifesaving gift that Garnet was denied. Garnet's wife Megan is now left to speak for him, to keep his story alive and fight for those still being discriminated against by our healthcare systems. She raises their five children now, hoping that Garnet's death can create change for her children's future and stop medical discrimination in Canada. .

FREEDOM CORP - THE ARTS

FREEDOM CALENDAR

Tanya Richter

The world of art is a vast and incredible place, a visual representation of emotion, personality and history. Throughout history art has been a fundamental story teller from cultures all over the world, capturing historical events, cultural experiences and both the beauty and the pain experienced by humanity in every day moments. We look back at these pieces of artistic expression in awe of the human experience, studying their significance in culture today and each taking something different from them.

Growing up, Tanya was not an artistic person but while she was working at an airport she started sketching and as people started noticing her talent she decided maybe she should try art school. After enrolling in art school she found that it just wasn't her thing, it was too constrictive for her and so she decided to move on eventually working for Canada's Worst Driver painting props. This was something she found more up her ally and led her into taking her pyrotechnics license and starting a career in film.

When the pandemic hit and the masking requirements were instated, Tanya found it very difficult to work on set. Her own medical complications from constant masking were already causing a lot of stress on her but when the vaccines started rolling out she wasn't sure how long she would have job. Three different people in her workplace experienced a vaccine injury in the first six months after their shots and no one recognized there was a problem. Two weeks before convoy there was a union meeting she describes as the largest union meeting she had attended in years, and she and her colleagues were told they have no choice, and so she had to walk away.

2 weeks later, Tanya saw Convoy starting to roll across Canada. The frustration and isolation she was feeling started turning into love again for Canada, and she decided she needed to go take part. Seeing the crowd in Ottawa changed a lot for Tanya, that feeling of being crazy, being gaslit, feeling alone was gone and she knew this was something that would go down in history. After she left, she felt the need to express herself in what she saw in Ottawa and this has become the 2023 Freedom Calendar.

Artistic expression, whether it be music, sculpture or painting, connects us all. These paintings, done by Tanya Richter, have captured the spirit of the Canadian people in an incredible time of hope, love for one another and courage. Her depictions of this time are beautiful, raw and diverse. Years from now, the story of Freedom Convoy will remain alive through her work, reminding Canadians they are never alone, they always have community and to stay hopeful.
